associated with treatment of disability in children with cancer. Food insecurity and diet diversity have been shown to have an influence on nutritional outcomes, but it is not known if these factors affect the nutritional status of children with cancer. The objective of

this study was to test if the feeding practices of food insecure families were associated with nutritional outcomes and if feeding practices could explain differences in nutrition status. Eligible children aged 2-20 years with cancer, admitted to St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, were recruited to participate between December 2007 and September 2009. Two-day dietary recalls were completed prior to treatment and during the final month of treatment. The child's weight, height, and bone age were recorded at intake. Twenty-two percent of children were found to be underweight.

The mean intake of energy, protein, zinc, phosphorus, and iron was significantly lower than the recommended amounts at intake and during the final month of treatment. However, the mean intake of calcium and vitamin C was significantly higher than the recommended amounts at intake and at the final month of treatment.

Families reported difficulties with food access, including finding food at home, paying for food, and acquiring food at a supermarket. Additionally, there was a trend toward underreporting of some foods.

Food insecurity was associated with weight, height, and Tanner staging and was able to explain some of the difference in nutrition status by Tanner stage.

This study provides the first description of food insecurity and diet diversity on the nutritional status of children with cancer. Given the relationship between food insecurity f30f4ceada
