Citing “backlogs of cases” and “severe shortages of defence lawyers,” Canada’s Supreme Court is accepting more provincial applications for federal court appointments. The court said in a release Friday that it’s working to “reduce the backlog of cases before it and to deal with the severe shortage of defence lawyers,” and it has “no intention of limiting the expansion of the pool of eligible defence lawyers.” In order to be eligible, applicants must be a member of the federal court bar, be a graduate of a Canadian law school, be a resident of the province where they wish to be appointed, and live within 200 kilometres of a courtroom in the province. Applicants must also be subject to a background check conducted by the court and the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer. In 2013, the court had only 1,018 lawyers registered, and by the end of March 2019 that number had increased to 2,9
