Glucocorticoid receptor gene polymorphisms and the susceptibility to breast cancer. The glucocorticoid receptor gene (NR3C1) is a major transcriptional regulator of cortisol, a steroid hormone that has been reported to be involved in the etiology of breast cancer. In this case-control study, we genotyped two single nucleotide polymorphisms (SNPs) previously shown to be associated with serum cortisol levels and analyzed their association with the risk of breast cancer. The study population consisted of 201 breast cancer patients and 225 controls. Genetic analyses were performed by polymerase chain reaction (PCR)-restriction fragment length polymorphism (RFLP) or allele-specific PCR in 239 breast cancer patients and 291 controls. The rs41423247 polymorphism (A>G) was found to be associated with an increased risk of breast cancer and the G allele was in linkage disequilibrium with a haplotype including
