wrap-up It's been quite a trip for The Con Simulator, each of us needing to take a break from filling in lines and ordering fake drinks, and go back to being real journalists. It's been a tough week for some of us, with our work being picked up by Canadian newspapers and news websites based in at least three countries and several U.S. cities. Featured here is Philip Wenzel, who was chosen as a Kelowna Valley Press Best of the Rest winner for his reporting on "The Con Man" — an undercover operation by the RCMP in Moose Jaw that led to the jailing of a Saskatchewan man accused of trafficking cocaine. Wenzel also interviewed the accused man at his Kelowna detention centre, calling him "a willing, convicted drug trafficker." article continues below Before going to the jailhouse for this interview, the accused man was enjoying a movie. He told Wenzel he was happy he wasn't guilty: "Then I go to jail and life is divided in half. It's very sad to have it all gone." Who is the accused who told me "life is divided in half"? Was he referring to the nine-month sentence he has already endured in connection with his case? Or was he saying how this week's success of my book on his case will affect his freedom of action? Wenzel's story is also found on the Kitsap Sun website. Here's how its article stated what the accused gave Wenzel: "It's very helpful to have all the books in one place. The officers have read all the books and they support you 100 per cent so it makes things easier for you." Turns out, this is not the opinion of the RCMP officers and lawyers who worked on the case, even though the arrest and investigation were launched by local RCMP officers. One officer I interviewed referred to Wenzel's article as being "dead wrong," and misquoted a book and a quote. The officer told me: "He's a repeated offender, a flight risk. The guy just went back on his promise that he wouldn't go into Canada." The officer added: "We have one job - to protect the community and the community has said 'You know,

The paper was founded by the Manchester Union in 1875, and combined with the New Hampshire Union and the Manchester Observer in the early 1930s. History Early years The Union Leader was founded in 1875, a year after the Manchester Union published its first edition. Union Leader editor Henry P. In the early years, the Union Reporter was owned by James E. White, who later founded the Manchester Evening News.
