An international crew has travelled to the Chilean island of Magdalena de Maule where human remains dating back almost 9,000 years have been discovered. The site of the remains is located on the face of a coastal volcano, which was first discovered by an Australian-Chilean team of scientists in the 1930s. It was then followed by a French team in 1950s. The team members are now in Chile for the summer to continue their research and to conserve the site which is believed to have been used as a small Indigenous village during the final glacial maximum, which began around 14,000 years ago. Archaeologists and geoscientists used to the site say it has yielded exceptionally well-preserved remains of humans and animals, including
