Spinal nerve injuries are a common complication of open pit coal mining. A study was made of 50 workers in an open pit with coal mining to determine the rate of occurrence of one of the four spinal nerve branches of the lower limb and the distal relationships of these nerves. It was found that: (1) most of the lumbar spinal nerves of the lower limb were cut in their course by the worker's hands and therefore were not injured; (2) in only one case was the sciatic nerve injured, presumably from the hand; (3) in only one case was the common peroneal nerve injured, presumably because of a contusion by the belt-tied foot during a fall; and (4) in only one case was the lateral sural nerve injured at the level of the ankle. It is suggested that this minimal incidence may be due to the fact that the distal relationships of the lumbar spinal nerves of the lower limb are little affected by coal mining. -u*s + 5*s + 7.
