grep has been widely employed in a great variety of purposes, from making effective use of it to simply seeing what is going on. This is usually best accomplished by careful planning and letting the system do its job. 'echo' has been around for nearly twenty-five years, and the basic command can be used in almost any situation. The most common use of the echo command is to tell what is going on in a batch processing (such as a Makefile or shell script). If a file (or in general, process) is terminated by signal, its exit status (usually zero) is put into the variable named $?.
