The unified mailbox is especially useful for smaller organizations that use one email server (such as Exchange) for their business emails and another for personal emails

(such as Gmail). Users can use Xeams to access their personal emails from anywhere and every email that they access is automatically pushed to a mailbox on Xeams so that users can access their emails from any place. (Note: Personal emails cannot be accessed from the unified mailbox) -Automatic management of multiple smtp servers and pop

What's New in the Xeams?

This is my wishlist of Xeams features: Just in case you are curious, here is my wishlist of Xeams features: 1. Ability to filter messages using antivirus (AV) scanner (e.g. antivirus can scan messages before they are sent). It does not matter if the AV is on Xeams or its native (i.e. antivirus on your native email server). 2. SMTP implementation of mails like hotmail. As I read on the website, they actually use the hotmail smtp server, but they have their own version. Every message sent through their own server will have their own unique message ID. This way, if you delete it on Xeams server, you will always be sure that the message was actually deleted from your hotmail account. 3. Multilingual capability. As in, the ability to create emails with different languages. 4. Client tools. Xeams offers a built-in email client. Its capable of searching emails, attaching files, calendar appointments and more. 5. Unlimited attachments. 6. Integrated calender. 7. Calendar filter. 8. Drafts management. 9. Addressbook management (vcard format) 10. Customizable user interfaces. 11. Firewall control. 12. Anti SPAM. 13. Free. 14. Opera browser compatibility. 15. Stability. I had no problem with Xeams in my personal setup. 16. Ability to create custom mails with different email clients. 17. Storage space quotas. 18. Log File Flexibility (like multiple logfiles for different user accounts) On some occasions the logs of xeams wont be enough. There's no database of reported uses, no real user-friendly web interface, and it has no good network filtering ability. It's also hard to configure for large-scale email distribution. I want a web-based email client, that uses multiple sources of email authentication (passport, gmail, yahoo, hotmail), can be extended with plugins, and uses stats such as number of messages per user, IPs with high use, countries, etc. In short, a real-time web-based email client. It's a web-based version of Nagios - simple, scalable monitoring, without the need for administrators to maintain Nagios servers.

Features: □ Real-time monitoring of 100-500
