Spontaneous secretion of serotonin from rabbit atria. The spontaneous secretion of serotonin was found to occur from isolated segments of rabbit atria under conditions in which it was previously undetectable. This release was confirmed in experiments employing high performance liquid chromatography with electrochemical detection. The serotonin release was found to have the characteristics of a Ca(2+)-dependent exocytotic event, with a slow onset and an overshoot before declining to a stable plateau level. A transitory elevation of calcium ion concentration was detected in the bathing medium, which is likely to be responsible for the observed elevated baseline secretion. Furthermore, the finding of a sufficient amount of endogenous serotonin suggests that an alteration of its metabolism may lead to alteration of local transmembrane ion gradients. The dual role of Rho GTPase Cdc42 in T-cell receptor signaling. Accumulating evidence suggests that the Rho family of small guanosine triphosphatases (GTPases), originally discovered in studies of the morphology of motile organisms, is required for activation of many cell-surface receptors. This paper presents new evidence for a dual role of Cdc42, the prototypical
