Cows On The Road The Irish cow needs special attention after being more popular among humans than the rest of the world's bovine population, a fact that a new study has found has seriously impacted on the health of the animal. The findings of the study, which looked at the health of cows in 17 different countries, has warned there is a need for improved regulation, particularly relating to the transport of cattle. "Cows are now transported more widely than at any point since the large-scale international trade in live animals began in the 19th century. As a result, many aspects of their welfare are compromised during transport," said lead author of the study, Dr Donald Morris from the University of Cambridge, in the US. He said: "There is now an urgent need to place greater restrictions on the transport of cattle around the world, particularly as more countries seek to compete with one another for increasingly lucrative trade in beef." The researchers from Cambridge and the Wellcome Trust, which is headquartered in London, chose to study the impact of transport of cows on their wellbeing by determining the prevalence of parasites in the animals across the world. The research team travelled to Australia and Queensland, the Republic of Ireland, Kenya, the Republic of Korea, China, and the US. In the US they also studied the health of cows of different age groups and genders. Specifically they looked at faecal samples from five age groups – juvenile (under 6 months), weaner (1 to 4 months), first lactating (6 months to 3 years), second lactating (4 to 6 years) and older cows (more than 6 years). They compared these to determine which were the most commonly found parasites in each group. The team from the University of Cambridge, found that the findings in the US was strikingly similar to the global picture: "As in all countries, pigs harboured a greater parasite burden than cows," said study author Dr Morris. Interestingly, the team also found that the number of animals with Giardia parasites, which they found were most prevalent in the juvenile and second lactating groups, was higher among the more northern states of the US. Additionally, the research team found that 14 per cent of cows in the US were infected with parasites that cause disease in people. This is particularly concerning when one considers how many of these parasites are a cause of diarrhoe

The invention pertains to wound dressings and, more particularly, to sheet-like dressings which are both adhesive and anti-adhesive. Conventional dressings for wounds are commonly formed of fibrous material, such as cotton gauze. The fibrous material has the disadvantage of being unduly abrasive. For example, the fibrous material may abrade the wound resulting in increased bleeding and difficulty in healing the wound. Also, conventional dressings formed of fibrous material are difficult to keep dry while on the patient. Although certain dressings of foam material have been proposed, such foam dressings also tend to be abrasive and difficult to keep dry.Wedding Vows Your wedding is one of the most important days in your life, and it will be a moment you will remember for the rest of your lives.
