Thu, 31 Aug 2013 14:03:08 +0000 >Q: Will Planck and Klein be pleased with Planck's constant being constant, and more importantly, what kind of mathematics would they find pleasing? If you were to write a paper on Planck and Klein, which would you be more proud of, the one which employs a constant h for the mass of electrons and photons etc, or the paper in which you are looking through h and finding incompatibility with your data? I am more fascinated by the latter, as it seems to hint there was something about h that had been overlooked. On the other hand, it is more likely that h was just some general constant and the discovery of its true value is a piece of luck/chutzpah (i.e. a fluke) on the part of Planck and Klein. Therefore, the question is, of these two is the first one more likely, or the second one? A: Be careful with the word 'pleasure', here. The first paper is, in fact, rather unpopular these days (that's why I'm not touting it), because of the fact that by Einstein relations, $m_{\text{Planck}} / \hbar$ is about equal to the speed of light, if we take c as constant. And this is actually what is often done, at least outside of mathematics. Usually it's calculated from a theoretical value for the mass of the photon or the electron, and a comparable one for the constant c . This is much harder to achieve, in fact. (For example, it's not really clear why the speed of light should remain constant when electrons and light particles are taken together, but not take into account photons and how charge behaves or something.)
