In the early 1990s, the term “white privilege” was a rough bit of political punchline. A privileged white man’s smug realization of his own upward mobility, it was a way for white liberals to deflect charges of racial condescension while still critiquing the political status quo. According to most of the white men who used it, you had to be a privileged white male to use the term—a white male who was born into a situation with a solid education, health care, and access to power, and who had an easier time than most people growing up, who thought that, rather than being a victim, he was actually an agent of social justice. White privilege, all the white privilege, was speaking to white men. That’s changed in the 2000s, as black men began to embrace the term, attaching it to the developing understanding that the structural privileges of their race have allowed them to be much better off than the average black person.

And now it's white men who find the term offensive, at least according to a new study published in the journal Educational Psychologist.

In a study of over 900 adults in the U.S., researchers are finding that white men are the most likely to see white privilege as a misperception—they view it as an issue following is not a complaint and is simply a reaction to a piece by CJ Ross in the National Post.

From the perspective of pro-union citizens like myself, Ross' essay offers nothing new. And, from the perspective of a pro-business politician, it is somewhat misleading. But, Ross' piece does not take into account the obvious fact that everyone is losing due to the Canada Revenue Agency's targeting of unionized Canadians. The CRA targets the opposition more than it targets the party in power. But it is also targeting the opposition from the perspective of bad fiscal math. This past spring, I wrote to the CRA and asked it to stop targeting unionized employees on the basis of a partial unemployment rate that includes all those unemployed and underemployed or who have part-time jobs that fall below full-time jobs. The CRA replied in detail explaining the difference between the two measures and its cost-benefit analysis. I will just summarize its reasoning here. The CRA costs benefit analysis also informs its argument that targeting unionized employees would not make it cost-effective. To say that the CRA makes an
