FIFA Ultimate Team FUT will feature new features such as Skill Shots, Player Drafts and be the first game in the FIFA franchise to allow players to earn and use a currency earned through gameplay called FIFA Points. FUT will also feature a brand new Acquisition system which allows players to sign and collect more than 1,000 different current and historic players from more than 100 national teams. As with the previous FIFA, players will be able to create custom kits and players for their FUT squads by purchasing a number of small kits in addition to larger kits made up of multiple parts. Players can earn customization points by buying a kit on their own and using these points to buy and wear custom made parts in the FIFA Ultimate Team editor. Every match, players will be able to earn up to 10,000 customization points by wearing kits in the Champions League. Additional information about FIFA Ultimate Team can be found on the FIFA website. FIFA 22 will be available for PlayStation 4, Xbox One and PC when it launches on September 29, 2015. We'll have a lot more information about the game later this week.

Q: How to populate class array without consuming unwanted memory? What is the best way to keep a reference to a class instance so as to reuse data members without filling up memory? For example, suppose we have a class named Foo with four members m_x, m_y, m_z, and m_w. We want to store Foo objects, Foos, in an array of pointers: Foo* Foos[NUM_FOO_OBJECTS]; Foo* pFoo = Foos[i]; However, the size of this data structure is not known ahead of time, and the total number of Foos that we need to store is also not known until runtime. What would be the best way to store this data structure? A: You store the object itself, and just keep a pointer to the object: std::vector foos; foos.reserve(NUM_FOO_OBJECTS); foos.push_back(new Foo(1, 2, 3, 4)); foos.push_back(new Foo(5, 6, 7, 8)); ... If you need to keep the objects around, but don't need the pointers anymore: std::vector foos

The present invention relates generally to vehicles and, more particularly, to a high speed movement simulator to simulate the appearance and behavior of a vehicle moving rapidly in a predetermined pattern. Simulators that provide the appearance and, therefore, the excitement of a vehicle moving rapidly are well known. These vehicles include fire engines with moving fire apparatus, police cars, rescue vehicles and military vehicles and, more recently, aircraft such as fighter aircraft, attack aircraft, helicopters, and the like. It is also known to provide the vehicle with weaponry. For example, it is known to provide such a vehicle with a light gun that is operated by the user to simulate firing a weapon toward an enemy. While these prior art simulators are useful for their intended purpose, they suffer from several drawbacks. First, they are generally not capable of simulating the appearance and behavior of a vehicle moving rapidly for a prolonged period.
