Ask HN: What DDoS attack types did you get hit with? - rythkuj I've been noticing more and more people complaining on HN about DDoS attacks. I'm curious as to what types of attacks, where/how, what the status of your network/servers/services are, etc. If anyone has data on these, it would be appreciated. ===== jswny There are three types of attacks that I've been experiencing: TCP SYN, DNS reflector and packet floods. 1\). TCP SYN: The user clicks the link they want to visit and the visiting computer sends a SYN packet to the server. A SYN is like a handshake with the web server. Before a request is sent, the client sends a SYN packet to the server to initiate a connection. If the server accepts the connection, the client will send an ACK to the server for the SYN in the response. When the server receives an ACK in response, it will respond with the HTTP request in the response. If the server rejects the request, the client will receive a RST from the server. 2\). DNS reflector: A DNS query is like a handshake with a DNS server. When the server knows how to route the request to the target server, it will respond with the IP address and port of the target server. If the server rejects the request, it will respond with a RST. 3\). Packet floods: A packet flood is when a lot of spoofed or malicious TCP packets are sent to a server. If the packets are spoofed, the packet will still be processed by the server. If the packets are malicious, the packet will override the request with malicious data such as a request for a virus or malicious code. These are the types of attacks that I've been experiencing and the system I've been testing is a PHP server and a MySQL database, running on Ubuntu Linux 10.04. I have yet to receive any actual DDoS attacks but I suspect that they could be because I have a firewall between me and the
