Lebanon's Hezbollah are seen inside a military vehicle in the western outskirts of the capital Beirut, Lebanon, December 4, 2019. REUTERS/Mohamed Azakir Hezbollah's Beirut stronghold is under heavy security as U.S. President Donald Trump has indicated the United States is looking to open talks with Iranian ally Tehran, proposing a new negotiating format for an international agreement on Iran's nuclear program. Hezbollah's top military commander warned on Wednesday that if the U.S. attacked Iran in the region, the group would protect its allies in Lebanon, including the airport in Beirut. "If America attacks Iran we'll defend Lebanon. If they try to attack the airport in Beirut we'll chase them out," Brigadier General Hossein Salami said at a press conference, according to state news agency NNA. But later on Wednesday, an Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman said Tehran was unsure what the militia was trying to achieve, according to state news agency IRNA. "Iran does not have any animosity with Lebanon or its allies... We do not have animosity with the airport of Lebanon or its security," spokesman Abbas Mousavi was quoted as saying. Hezbollah fighters and allies remain deployed on various fronts across Lebanon where they have been engaged in deadly clashes with Sunni insurgents loyal to a former prime minister and his allies. U.S. officials say Hezbollah, which fought a civil war against Israel in the 1980s and is classified by Washington as a terrorist group, is linked to a deadly attack by Iran on an American military base in Iraq in early 2018. Hezbollah and its allies on Tuesday shot down an Israeli drone flying near the border area between Israel and Syria.

Buy the eBook "Something About Ocean" by P Furtado at or circuit technology has recently made dramatic strides, with the result that active components are now being located in the same chip as passive components, so that the final chip structure is much smaller, faster, and much less expensive. The technology allows new and better products to be designed with lower costs and greater reliability. In particular, many applications are now possible where previously it was not feasible to incorporate active components in the same chip. However, the same technology that resulted in the reduction of size, power consumption, and cost, results in more complex circuitry, and a high pin count. In order to keep pace with the present trends, more versatile packaging technology is needed. In the packaging of microelectronic devices, several packaging technologies have been used. These technologies include C4, CBGA, BG, PGA, PLCC, TO-8. TO-5, and TAB, C4 is a connective interconnection technology that is used in the packaging of surface mount devices. C4 uses metal conductive wires and plated vias to interconnect various surface mount devices to other surface mount devices and to other levels. CBGA is a capillary ball grid array technology in which the conductive traces of a ceramic or plastic package interconnect to a capillary bumped surface mount. BG is a solder bump grid array technology in which the conductive traces of a ceramic or plastic package interconnect to a solder bumped surface mount. PGA is a ball grid array interconnection technology that uses a similar design as BG, except that the solder bumps are plated with a precious metal such as gold. PLCC is a pin grid array interconnection technology which uses fine, conductive wires to interconnect the pins of a ceramic or plastic package to a PCB. PGA, PLCC, and TO-8 all need a soldering procedure to permanently bond the package to the PCB. TAB is a tape automated bonding interconnection technology in which the conductive traces of a flexible tape interconnect to a PCB. TAB does not require a soldering procedure to permanently bond the package to the PCB. However, TAB is not useful with high density devices because the conductive trace material is a thin foil. TAB is not practical with a high pin count because of interconnection
