Pancreatic ductal adenocarcinoma (PDAC) remains the most lethal malignancy in the developed world with no effective therapeutic modalities. A better understanding of the molecular signaling pathways that initiate and drive tumor invasion and dissemination is needed to develop improved treatment strategies. This study reports that the Hedgehog signaling pathway, a key regulator of embryonic development and adult tissue homeostasis, promotes pancreatic cancer progression. Here, we show that Hedgehog inhibition with both direct and indirect mechanisms suppresses the cell invasion of a pancreatic cancer cell line. This study further indicates that the pancreatic cancer metastasis-suppressive properties of mesenchymal stem cells are suppressed by Hedgehog-dependent mechanisms. Finally, we show that conditioned media from PDAC cells with Hedgehog pathway activation are able to change the expression of mesenchymal stem cells and that blocking Hedgehog expression in these mesenchymal stem cells inhibits the invasive phenotype of the PDAC cells. Our results provide a potential strategy in the development of new therapies for PDAC and present Hedgehog pathway inhibition as a candidate therapeutic modality in the treatment of pancreatic cancer.If you were to compare a world with an infinite supply of coffee to one without, you would easily notice that the world with an infinite supply of coffee is a world in which each person can have their own little cup of coffee at any moment. And so it would be such a world, if each person ever had their own little cup of coffee; and that cup of coffee can only get more delicious as time goes by, and every cup will be better than the last one, and you will have only had one cup of coffee, but you will have liked it so much! You would not be right though. If we could time travel, and if the faster you run, the younger you would be and run as fast as possible, at the end you could be a couple of centuries older than you are now, and you would have been exposed to the infinite supply of coffee. And it would look like this; we all would have had the exact same coffee at the exact same moment, as if it was all at the same time; and every cup would be
