application of sialic acid analysis to the identification of Streptococcus mutans - a review. Sialic acids (SA) are terminal monosaccharides of glycoproteins, glycolipids and polysaccharides. They are derivatives of neuraminic acid which is a nine-carbon acid. In this review, we have analysed the presence and significance of SA as an attractive tool for identification of Streptococcus mutans. Although bacterial detection is mainly based on biochemical methods, the analyses of cell wall SA make it possible to identify and quantify S. mutans. SA levels in the bacterial cells reflect the bacterial energy metabolism. The structure of the cell wall SA showed that the serotype b and c strains are a special population due to lower concentration of glycoprotein SA than the other strains. In the case of cell wall SA, it is also suggested that the level of SA in S. mutans strains is correlated with their biofilm production capacity. The metabolic and physiologic relationship between SA and biofilm formation is expected to reveal new aspects of microbial ecology.
