In this study, we examined the effect of a new agent, prilocaine, on the prevention of neuroleptic malignant syndrome (NMS) induced by haloperidol. Seven patients who were diagnosed as having schizophrenia were divided into 2 groups. In one group the mean dosage of haloperidol was determined to be 6.7 mg/day (range: 4-12 mg/day), and in the other group this dose was continued for 8 days without prilocaine, and thereafter prilocaine was administered. The mean total dose of prilocaine in the group where haloperidol was administered for 8 days with or without prilocaine was 247 mg, which is significantly higher than that in the group where prilocaine was administered in the immediate post-operative period (208 mg). Therefore, the study suggests that prilocaine is effective for the prophylaxis of NMS induced by haloperidol, and that this agent can be used in the immediate post-operative period in patients undergoing haloperidol administration. Over the years, there's been an increasing demand for high-quality handheld electronic products, and that demand has brought a new audience to the market: Millennials. Due to the constraints of mobile phones, the design of handheld electronic products has increasingly innovated. With its "Pocket Galaxy" W5000, Yotaphone has added a touch and multi-directional button, a touch sensor, a selfie camera, and a speaker. The manufacturers have increased the number of buttons and components, but the basic portable function has not changed much. However, the release of Yotaphone's "Pocket Galaxy" may help with the advancement of handheld electronics. The Target Market Handheld electronic products with high screen resolution are the target market of Yotaphone, but these products have been commercialized so far.
