Why are these used as a battering ram to invade Syria? Why is the media covering it as if it were a bygone, insignificant, non-issue, unrelated to what's happening in the world right now? What is a situation where the U.S. government wants to arm allies to go on a campaign of aggressive war to invade another nation, while doing very little about invading nations themselves? The U.S. goes out and sells weapons to people who might use them. As such, it's no shock that the U.S. sold $100 million worth of the Harpoon missiles to Turkey a couple of weeks ago. The U.S. is a government that sells weapons to a government that might use them. There's no moral dilemma about this. But the use of these weapons was a problem because they were used on American allies. Even if Turkey were not allied to the U.S., it would still be problematic for the U.S. government to sell weapons systems to Turkey that could be used in an invasion of Syria. But Turkey isn't allied with the U.S. because Turkey is not on good terms with the U.S. for whatever reason. Still, the U.S. has no moral qualms about selling these weapons to a government that might use them to kill people. The U.S. government is perfectly happy about selling weapons to non-allies that may be used to kill people. It just wants to appear like it's a big champion of freedom and democracy, even if in reality the U.S. spends a lot of time watching as its ally in Syria kills and kills and kills, killing people. But it turns out the U.S. has been selling these weapons to Turkey for months. This was not a recent event. The New York Times reports: " c6a93da74d
