unfortunately, while the win32 api is widely supported, it is not available in the windows phone 8.1 sdk, which is the toolkit that microsoft uses for windows phone development. the same problem exists for the windows store platform, which is the target for windows phone apps. to install opengl on windows phone, you need to follow the instructions in the article install open graphics library for windows phone 8.1, which includes information on the minimum requirements and the process of adding the dll to your application. the dll should be added to the <app name>.appxmanifest file, which is located in the %programfiles(x86)%\microsoft\xde\xde7 directory. the opengl32.dll file should be added as a reference to the <application> node. i can't seem to find drivers that are compatible with both windows 10 and an intel 2nd generation processor. i did find that microsoft has a driver that can be installed for older windows systems, but that driver doesn't support opengl 2.1. i also cannot install my graphics drivers for windows 10 or windows 8.1, and there doesn't seem to be a way to install the earlier drivers for windows 10. even microsoft's own website states that: with this in mind, it seems that no one is really developing drivers for windows 10 (even if they have a windows 7 license, which i don't have). however, the intel website states that the q45-45w is supported with the windows 7 version of the driver. this is false; in reality, all graphics chips are supported with the windows 7 version of the driver, but it is noted in the intel hd graphics 4000 driver that there is no opengl support.
