You mentioned in a comment above that you couldn't tell what material the crack was in. I know from experience that it is very important to have a sense of what the material in the crack is. Modern concrete is usually poured over top of old, old or inappropriate subfloor or sills. For that reason, on a recent job where I was installing a new concrete slab, I slipped in the "new" floor, sliced my finger open and learned that there was old reclaimed/recycled (I think they were called forest green?) subflooring in the crack. It's not uncommon to see old cement, clay brick or old wood in cracks or sills of slabs. The amount of material is important. It might be just enough to see in a photo and to be able to say, from experience, that it is old material and that repair could be needed. If you don't know the amount of old material, you might start by considering the extent of the crack and how that would affect your initial plan. As you look through more photos, you might get a sense of what the amount of material is. I've got a patio project that I'm doing the next few weeks and am a bit stumped at the crack situation. I have a patio with one of those concrete floors you mentioned. I was going to simply lay new concrete, but I had a strong suspicion there was a problem. Anyhow, a friend of mine suggested I have them do some other stuff to me, like stain the floor black. He said it'll make me feel better about the patio "fixing". I'd like to walk on that patio myself and was going to ask the contractor what they're doing about the crack. But I don't want to give up any tricks, so I'm asking the hell out of them. They tell me it's the concrete. It's not bad (sorry I know I said that already) but they did forget to put a barrier underneath the floor. It's like they threw some mortar in the middle of my patio floor and just let the concrete dry. As you can guess, it's pretty bad and they're getting me a new floor. I'd rather use the patio floor than get tile, especially since my new carpet can't handle concrete nearly as easily.
