in addition to observing the kremlin-sponsored media and other sources, u.s. military personnel should familiarize themselves with the military academies. past and present russian military students are frequently interviewed on prominent russian news programs and their views, if not those of their officers, are often reported. also, students are frequently quoted in books, monographs, and journals that offer a look at contemporary russian military thinking. although these sources are less accessible than those sponsored by the russian ministry of defence, they offer information about potential problems and the type of thinking that is in vogue among russia's military elite. the increased activity from the kremlin's global information operations must be carefully evaluated. while the kremlin has significantly scaled down its use of social media sites, it is much more active on other forms of media. as noted, information gained from these sources has to be balanced with information gleaned from the u.s. military's own operations to ensure that u. military forces do not inadvertently provide the kremlin with information that would assist their own operations. u. military personnel should also understand that, as the former director of national intelligence and national security advisor, former admiral michael mcconnell, has noted, the russian view of the world is considerably different than americans. the kremlin does not recognize the legitimacy of u. domains, such as the united nations, nato, the european union, and the european union itself. moreover, the kremlin perceives the spread of democracy, human rights, and globalization as destabilizing forces threatening russian political, economic, and security interests. recent polling data suggests that increasing support in russia for autocratic forms of government and leaders who provide direct military and economic support to the armed forces is growing. in putin's russia, propaganda and disruption are no longer fringe phenomena. these and other realities are significant challenges to the ability of u. military personnel to develop credible and effective military responses to what is becoming a far more contested information environment.
