Id. at 103. The reasoning of this decision applies with even more force to the Plaintiffs' case, because Plaintiffs allege that the Defendant, unknown to the Plaintiffs, was the owner of the truck that struck the Plaintiffs' car, and not just a business establishment. For this reason, this case involves more than the typical premises liability case; it involves the issue of whether, in spite of the absence of a special relationship between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant, the Plaintiffs can sue the Defendant. The district court decision in Drackett was appealed and a Third Circuit panel affirmed the decision on the grounds that the plaintiffs were independent contractors who were exposed to a risk of harm separate and distinct from the risk of harm arising out of an injury to a member of their own independent contractor's work force. Applying this analysis, the Third Circuit held that the Plaintiffs in Drackett, who were not themselves members of their own independent contractor's work force, could not sue the defendant for personal injuries. In the matter sub judice, unlike the circumstances in Drackett, there is no allegation in the complaint that the Plaintiffs and their decedent were members of the work force of their independent contractors. Finally, the majority holds that the Plaintiffs are not entitled to be recognized as independent contractors for purposes of premises liability. The majority has decided that the Plaintiffs have failed to allege facts that if proven would give rise to a claim for premises liability and that, on the contrary, the Plaintiffs' decedent was an independent contractor, and, therefore, a member of his own independent contractor's work force. If this decision is right, the Plaintiffs have no claim for premises liability, and the Plaintiffs cannot maintain their claims for negligence and willful or wanton misconduct. Moreover, in the event that the Plaintiffs could have maintained a premises liability claim against the Defendant, based on the injury to their decedent
