Overall, I still consider Adobe Photoshop to be the best raw converter for still photos. One of the most important new features is the ability to automatically export to JPEG. This means that when using a RAW file format, you get the best out-of-camera JPEG for free. This is like the auto save feature that you can enable in Lightroom. As a result you can concentrate on the photo itself rather than worrying about saving it into an incompatible format. The ability to edit Scene modes is a godsend for portraits where background and people may be in different levels of darkness. It's simply a feature that wasn't there before. It's great for any type of scene where you need to change the exposure of the background as well as the faces. It's the little things like this that make the upgrading of Adobe Photoshop to the most recent version worthwhile. I look forward to being able to use it in my own edits, the only complaint I have at the moment is that the "Adjust All" option is missing. It hasn't been replaced by a quicker interface or an undo function in this release. Maybe it's a bug in my computer. I think it's worth noting that EPDF technology has been lost. Why? There was no reason at the time to make this change. Thankfully, with Adobe ACR Basic it's possible to open raw files directly in the context of a Lightroom catalog. This means you can add them to the Lightroom cloud and sync them back to your desktop. I've started the process and will see how that works out. I'm using a 27GB MacBook Pro and can only store 20GB. Hopefully, I can back Up in the cloud to a more suitable hardware solution. I was thinking 64GB, but that's probably asking too much. The new Adobe Bridge adds a lot of useful features like Smart Previews, Internet Galleries, Groups, and more.

In this image I would like to add a bit more depth and depth of field to the image. I would like to add some additional focus to her face and strengthen the shadows on her face to make it more dramatic (Figure 1.11 11). Open a new document in Photoshop and create the shape for her hair. I would also like to add a nice arc to her hair and a bit of color to the half of the background in the shadowed area. I would also like to make her eyes more colorful in the shape of an eye. Create a new layer, add a gradient and make the line longer and brighter. To do this, simply create your transition color first with the color picker. I would like to add a bit more purple to her eyes. I want to also give her arm a bit more life with a color gradient.
