The website displays data from a recent backup, but if the database does not update the information on the website, it will not be up to date. My web host updates the database every 3 hours, and I do not receive email when the database updates, so it often only updates before I need to make a new backup. I am going to look into updating the database with crontab and email the web host when the data is updated, but this seems to be an unreliable solution. Is there any way to ensure that the website displays updated information with cron or something similar? A: The simplest solution (and the most obvious one) is to "poll" the database server. There's two ways of doing this: polling your database software itself using an external polling program MySQL has an internal tool that does exactly what you want: Oracle RDBMS can be queried for live changes: Channing Tatum stars in the indie comedy "Papa's Got a Brand New Bag," which opened in limited release over the weekend and now has expanded to nearly 600 screens. The movie will be hoping for a strong opening and seems well-timed as the advance buzz for his sequel “
