I am writing a program to parse the data inside a binary file into an in-memory structure (where I can perform statistical analysis on it) but it would be very helpful if I didn't have to load the entire file into memory every time I need to query the data. I know that reading a binary file into memory is pretty fast but is there a way to store the loaded file in RAM so I don't have to go back to disk for every time I want to query the data? I assume this is impossible since RAM is limited and a binary file is too large for it (it is only around 5MB but it could be much bigger in the future). Am I correct? Or is there another alternative? A: When you read data from a file, you get it in its physical representation on the hard drive (you can even write data to a file if the number of bytes to write is small enough). If you need the data in some other representation, e.g., as a list of strings or a list of integers, you have to convert that data into another representation (converting each item into a string for a string representation, etc.). Even if you stored the entire file in RAM (which isn't possible, since RAM is limited), you wouldn't be able to modify the data that you've read into RAM. If you
