I'd like to start by saying that I love Photoshop. The fact that the software is free; that it is supported by a company that makes a huge number of other apps; and that the basics are included makes it irresistibly affordable for us digital photographers. In the past, Photoshop was suggested if you were interested in business graphics, using Adobe had made it possible for us professionals to do our jobs and make a living with what the title "Photography" implies. Now, Photoshop is too often suggested for digital photography because of the influence of Photoshop. Many users use Photoshop not for enhancing their photos, but rather to remake them. There is a great deal of power in Photoshop, but there's also a great deal of power in a non-destructive workflow, and that is something that a lot of photographers could stand to benefit from. Most photographers have seen a few too many Apple products in their careers: iPads, iPhones, Macs, and even, "celebrity" iPhones. For a while, the iMac was a "king of desktop computers", but then Apple moved on. It's time Intel brought some competition to the desktop. The way users see desktop computers is changing. They're buying new laptops and other gadgets over the course of their lives. The last thing they want or need to worry about is buying a new computer every time they replace a device. Since Intel has been pushing for this decreased in power consumption, it's up to them to embrace Linux and make it ready for the desktop.

Bloomington – April 15, 2019— Today Adobe made its 20 million Creative Cloud subscription available to all customers on iOS, macOS, and Android devices at no additional charge. The cloud-based platform offers powerful, subscription-based access to today's most popular desktop creative tools. Subscriptions to the platform also include access to future upgrades and updated features. Previously, customers aligned to Photoshop and Lightroom desktop applications on Windows and Macintosh platforms had to subscribe to the premium tier of the Creative Cloud to get access to the latest and greatest updates to tools. " Adobe customers have been asking for flexibility and choice when it comes to how they can work with their images, and now they have it in every device and operating system," said Tim Just, vice president, Creative Cloud Product Management at Adobe. "Whether you use Photoshop on a desktop or an Android phone, our strategy is to make it easy for you to work with all the images in your life in a secure environment. With 20 million Creative Cloud members, we are now the largest subscription-based imaging platform in the world. We keep adding new features and tools to Photoshop so that customers can create at scale, and are committed to innovating with customers." Developers can use the Creative Cloud to publish a new software update available for all of their registered Creative Cloud users. With all of the desktop Creative Cloud apps, on macOS and Windows, updating is available up to twice a week based on the application's retail channel. On Android, updates are available more often based on the operating system's release cycle.
