This issue is easy to overlook, but I think it will have a negative impact on the Mac's adoption rate. It makes it harder to attract – and keep – people who work exclusively with Apple hardware. Nonetheless, this feature is the way to go and it'll work well in the future. Nonetheless, it's not a good idea to launch QuickTime Connect videos from iPad simply because you can. That's the reason why Apple kept the feature closed in the first place. I'd like to be able to download QuickTime Connect videos and then watch them directly on my mobile device – seamlessly, in other words. I would have liked to see Apple add more apps to the Mac App Store, and consider QuickTime Connect is yet another feature like that. It seemed like a no-brainer to add at least a few more media players to the Mac App Store. There's a reason why there are less than 100 commercial Mac apps in the App Store. Every single one of them needs to invest a considerable amount of time in both creating a new app and coding the app for the Mac App Store. Apple has by now given the Mac App Store a fair shake, but the huge number of rejected apps tells a different story. It's not even a matter of the Apple's App Store popularity. Every app I mentioned needs to generate business. As it is, none of these apps generates much income, and this isn't an indication of what people would pay for these apps if they were offered to purchase – easily, of course – in the Mac App Store. Is the built-in photo-editing applications of Windows 10 powerful enough for you? Board Share is a free app that lets you share your favorite creations with your Facebook friends—and a photo you have no intention of giving up for good. You'll know your PhotoBooths aren't just a one-time deal, since these creations can be delivered to your friends over and over and over again.
