Throughout this Nikon D5 review, I'll be reviewing the camera's images in working Lightroom 5.8.1 with Adobe Creative Cloud 2019. First up is the camera's 24.3 megapixel sensor. This is as big as I've shot with a DSLR camera. Even my 16-35mm F4.0-5.6 kit lens has the same maximum aperture, as well as much more reach in focal length. By comparison, my normal 16-35mm lens is only 14mm-50mm now. The D5 is much wider than my Nikon 1 V3. However, it's also a huge camera for what I need. Because Adobe is such a big company, it's invited to share developing builds with other companies to get feedback. Adobe also hands out a number of awards at their annual user conference AR tech week. All of these are given out in a public arena with live audience participation and after the event, Adobe posts the video on their site along with a video commentary by the judge. One thing that's not included anywhere is the X-Ray tool that makes the review panel so helpful; this tool is extremely useful to determine exactly what part of an image is distracting anorexic models or accident victims, and who knows what else might lurk in an image. The Public Beta programs are a great way to check things out without having to shell out your hard-earned money. It's a safe way to try things out, as there are no promises of quality if you decide to keep using their software. For example, it's possible to download a Photoshop Lightroom 12 Beta and keep it forever, since there isn't a one-year expiration like there is with the Photoshop CS (and CS+) version. What's more, this is a version of Photoshop Lightroom that's not available in the public beta program, so if a problem does crop up, you won't have to deal with it and pump a lot of money into a program that may not even have a solution.
