I was particularly impressed with the new Layer Comps feature. It enables you to view and compare the same layer in different shades, or even in a packed state, so that the same information is not repeated. Layers can be stacked, showing a list that will make it easy to navigate around them. And if you zoom a lot, layered images are saved in native resolution, meaning that they will save you tremendous disk space in the end. And, of course, Photoshop has become much faster. It still lacks some features, though. For example, it does not always attach the most appropriate keyboard shortcuts, as it does not feature the [Super] key like Lightroom does. Also, the entire system can become sluggish if you add a lot of layers. And although raw conversion and initial image processing may not be the most time-consuming duties of a digital photographer, it is still a major value-add that many of us appreciate. That's it. As an overall package, it still remains a good deal, with many interesting features. In addition, Photoshop's new suggestions are also a big addition, not to mention that it is now perfect for Mac users. Of course, the price is still high, so we would recommend you check out the Lightroom for Mac comparison for a more detailed breakdown of the two. The Windows platform still has an advantage since it has more creation options. Although Windows users can also get a Mac application, it's not as easy as clicking and dragging. You need to use a number of programs like DaVinci Resolve and DaVinci Resolve Studio to create content.
