I am learning about RegExp from a book, and it says: RegExp has a.set() method, which opens the RegExp in a function. That is, the RegExp string is converted to a Function How does that work, I mean how is that possible? Can someone please explain. A: You don't have to use set. You can do it directly: let re = /./ re.test('lots of /s/i'); // true You get both a string and a function with > const re = /./; > re; ./ > re.toString(); '\V[^/]+V' > re.toString().slice(1,-1) '[/[^/]*/]' The slice starts after the last /. Note that a regexp is regular like any other function, so you can create a functor with the usual context options: Object#hasOwnProperty RegExp#global, #ignoreCase, #multiline, #source and #lastIndex (The previous chapter has an example for the first with getOwnPropertyDescriptors().) Example: const re = new RegExp(...) The big ones were missing for a while, but that won't change now in ES6. Michelle Obama's shout-out to role models MICHELLE OBAMA has launched a full-on attack on Donald Trump as a "bully", in an interview with Oprah Winfrey, in which the first lady accused the president-elect of unleashing a "hostile takeover" of the US. Meanwhile, Melania Trump, who arrived with Donald at the WYCC in LA last night, refused to comment on her husband's election win. "I don't think we've thought through what is the cost
